- A boycott is an organized refusal by a group of people to deal with another person or group in order to achieve a specific goal. An illustration is the famous boycott that began in 1955 when Mrs. Rosa Parks refused to obey local laws requiring African-American people to sit in the back of the bus. Mrs. Parks was arrested, and that sparked a boycott of the Montgomery bus systems by African-Americans. The boycott was organized by Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. Rather than continue to lose money, the city repealed the law.

- During the War for Independence, the British and American armies were very different. The British army was composed of professional soldiers, while the American army was made up of civilians who knew little about military strategy and were untrained for warfare. Although the British were skilled soldiers, the colonists had one advantage they were more familiar with the terrain than their enemy. The English used cash and credit to outfit their army with uniforms, arms, and ammunition, but the American troops usually supplied their own arms and often wore only the clothing of the day, because there was no official government with tax or money or credit.

- In order to refill the treasury depleted by its many wars, the English Parliament passed the Stamp Act in 1765. This caused colonists to buy stamps to be placed on legal papers, diplomas and newspapers. The angry colonists, already burdened heavily, protested, since they believed that they were being taxed without being represented. As a result, the Stamp Act was repealed in 1776.
